Government guidance on child sexual exploitation promotes the dual aim of protecting victims and prosecuting abusers. Local partnerships have considerable expertise in safeguarding young people but there has been little consideration of their role in challenging perpetrators. This seminar reports on a recent Home Office-funded scoping exercise that explored ways of gathering evidence and found a significant role for children's services and other agencies with contact with young people. The seminar looks at ways to identify children and young people 'at risk' and to intervene and disrupt exploitative activity and prosecute those responsible.
